Round cairn standing on minor summit of Rhossili Down, on open moorland at around 180m above sea level. About 7 metres diameter, 0.3m high, of boulders and turf. There are traces of a stone kerb, and possibly of a central cist. The site is of national importance as a good example of an upland cairn, and is one of a major group of such cairns. It is on the line of the remains of a dry stone wall separating an area of uplands known as Bessie’s Meadow from Rhossili Down and the cairn was probably robbed to provide material for that wall.
